

Still a chance to get in on the Great Lakes School of Turfgrass Science
March 6, 2014

Though the short course has already started (Wednesday night, March 5) you still have a chance to get in on a valuable basic turf short course over the next nine weeks. Registrants can either take part live or watch it after the live recordings on Wednesday nights. Ten different instructors from nine of the leading turf universities and the Chicago District Golf Association are collaborating to present an online short course starting in March and lasting ten weeks. The course meets every Wednesday night from March 5 to April 9, live from 6:00 to 8:00 pm, and these sessions can also be viewed later. Multiple instructors will be involved every night insuring lively conversation and covering a full range of topics including turfgrass growth, soils, establishment, abiotic stresses, fertility, irrigation, and pest management. There will be some preliminary reading required as well as a number of working case studies each night. This is a perfect opportunity to advance the understanding of turf and management practices for you or anyone on your staff, all from the convenience of your home or office. Cost for the entire course is $395 and more information is on the following pages.

Zac Reicher, Professor, Turfgrass Science, zreicher2@unl.edu